

Serving on the Board of Directors of Breadroot Natural Foods Cooperative would create an opportunity for me to use my education and work experience in a fulfilling outlet that would contribute to my community.

Throughout my education, which was focused on sustainable agriculture at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, I learned to understand that a community-fed and community-lead food chain is the most resilient model both environmentally and economically. From my experiences as a student in the classroom, as a farmhand on organic CSA vegetable farms, and in my current position as a Production Director, controlling a supply chain from seed to sale, I believe I can offer a unique perspective to the Board of Directors that will contribute to the strengthening of our community.

An important challenge I believe Breadroot faces is the lack of awareness about what a Cooperative is and how individuals can benefit as shoppers and members of a community that supports itself.
